A few days ago, a man's deceased body (who is still unidentified) was found lying in a pool of blood on a sidewalk of his neighborhood. An autopsy of the corpse showed many bite marks, punctured organs, broken bones, and a pair of small animal incisors lodged into his forehead. Later that day, we found shocking footage on his security camera. The film showed a shrieking hamster chasing the frightened man through his doorway, often leaping forward to snap at his legs and back. He finally outran the tiny beast and hid behind his car, only for the hamster to miraculously fall out of the sky and latch onto his face. The hamster clawed and kneaded at the skin of his face, and his screams filled the air. After about 5 minutes, police cars reached the area, but it was too late, and the man was found dead. The police tried to shoot the hamster, but it dodged the bullet and ran towards the police car. The hamster was then seen pulling out a miniature wrench, which it stored in its cheek pouch, de-attaching the tire, and using it as a hamster wheel to make a quick getaway. Multiple searches for the hamster have been conducted, but none were successful yet. Though the cause of this attack is still unknown, scientists speculate that ancient witchcraft tempted the vicious rodent to maul the man.

Writer: Griffin Nolan

Over the past few years, tickler meat has risen in popularity, even replacing regular beef! The muscle matter of ticklers, which have long thought of as filthy, swamp-dwelling vermin, actually have many benefits. The meat is harvested from farms, where free range ticklers (most commonly the forager species) are kept.

1. Boosted Energy

Tickler meat replenishes your energy from the wet ooze. We interviewed a few people who eat tickler meat, and they say, “I've become more alert and more energized throughout the day.” Apparently, the chunks in tickler meat give you that boost that you need.

2. Promotes bone health

Forget the calcium! The copper filaments found within tickler meat provide as an excellent bone strengthener. Studies show that tickler meat consumers tend to have thicker, more fuller bones that can take more force. Just don't mind the coppery taste of wet pennies.

3. Clear Vision

20/20 is very expensive now days from people staring at the sun. However, people that eat tickler meat that wears glasses or contact lenses, are saying that their vision is getting better. The vision department did a study that tested 100 people that eat tickler meat and reported people's vision used to be a 10/20 is now 20/20.

4. Clean Teeth

You would think that you would get stinky breath and dirty teeth. But, due to the copper and sliver filaments in tickler meat, it's abrasive enough to clean your teeth. It's so abrasive that sometimes be used a teeth whitener.
